Prepped for Success

Incoming students reflect on the GPS Prep Program and how it has helped them navigate academics and career aspirations before day one of the school year

The demanding environment of graduate school can be challenging for anyone. Each summer, the Prep Program at the UC San Diego School of Global Policy and Strategy (GPS) provides a six-week review of classroom and career-related skills as well as insight into the academic and cultural environment at the School.

“Prep is for anyone who wants a head start on navigating the academic and cultural environment at GPS,” said Wendy Hunter Barker, assistant dean of Academic Programs. “This year we are celebrating the School’s 30th anniversary, and our training of the next generation of global leaders starts on day one of the program.”

Prepared for success academically and professionally, a key component of the program is the Career Orientation Program (COP). In addition to staff working with the students on a wide variety of topics such as internship and job searching skills and creating a successful LinkedIn profile, more than seven alumni came back to campus to impart their wisdom including current GPS Alumni Board President Blake Tye ‘10.

A former prep graduate herself, she discussed to a packed house of new students the importance of planting the career seeds early in their course work and concentrations.

“Having a career orientation program during prep is very helpful in terms of reminding students that there is life after graduation,” said Tye. “It is easy to get caught up in the day to day difficulties of statistical analysis and forget that there is an end game. Having this program allows for that extra motivation and push.”

Below we hear from a group of incoming students, from three different countries, to learn about their experience and what excites them about the impending school year.
Juan Sebastian Herrera, 2020 Master of International Affairs (MIA) candidate, Colombia

Before coming to GPS, Herrera worked at the Presidential Campaign of Humberto de la Calle and the Ministry of Culture of Colombia. These experiences solidified his decision to pursue graduate education in international development and nonprofit management.

“I wanted to learn how to take advantage of our enormous diversity in local assets to promote the economic development of the regions in Colombia that were neglected for more than 53 years of armed conflict,” said Herrera.

Enjoying the preparation for the academic year, Herrera believes the program offers the right mix to succeed in the university setting, from learning the pace of the quarter system to brushing up on basic math, statistics and economics.

“I’ve really enjoyed the faculty I’ve met so far, and I found them to be very passionate about their teaching,” said Herrera. “Professor Teevrat Garg taught us Bayes Theorem applied to Trump’s Travel Ban. It was amazing. To quote him, ‘do not think of statistics as math, but as arguments.’ Wow!”

Making the most out of his career prep, he plans to return home to contribute to peace consolidation and implementation after graduation, with the hope of becoming a minister in the Colombian government in the near future.

“Having career orientation from day one makes you feel confident and supported during this stage of our lives,” said Herrera. “I have great expectations for these next two years so it’s definitely comforting all the support I’ve received from COP.”

Camila Gomez Wills, 2020 Master of Public Policy (MPP) candidate

Having attended law school in the U.S., Colombia and Indonesia, Gomez Wills has worked with undocumented immigrants in the Northwest, capacity-building consulting firms for nonprofits and has been involved with the Colombian Peace Accord. At GPS, she hopes to bring her legal framework and curiosity to the interdisciplinary nature of the program.

“For as long as I can remember I have been interested in the notions of right/wrong and good/bad behavior,” said Gomez Wills. “I hope to learn about other normative systems to do research on comparative and interdisciplinary approaches to deterrence and prosocial behavior.”

When choosing a graduate program, she was eager to find a two-year degree that offered a high level of flexibility, while offering a competitive combination of quantitative and managerial skills that are useful in many work settings. During prep, she was positively surprised by the willingness of professors to meet with students.

“My most motivating days at prep have been those that I go into a professor’s office to discuss the questions that are roaming my mind and leave with insight and new perspectives,” said Gomez Wills. “This proximity is unthinkable at other institutions and has made an enormous difference to me.”

Enjoying the small group discussions during COP, she has enjoyed getting to know her classmates who share similar visions and goals for a future in policy work. From Taco Tuesday to picnics around town, Gomez Wills has enjoyed the easy transition into the San Diego lifestyle.

“My favorite memory of summer has been having picnics around San Diego’s parks,” said Gomez Wills. “I have already fallen into the San Diego stereotype and had my first surfing experience. It’s been great so far!”

Hwanghwi Cho, 2020 MPP candidate, Republic of Korea

Learning how to deal with extreme political confrontations, Cho has seen first-hand the power of elections, in charge of the overall election management during the 2017 impeachment of Korean President Park Geun-hye. Working at the National Election Commission (NEC) in Korea since 2009, he is eager to advance his knowledge in public policy.

“I believe that fair rules of elections and impartiality of the election administration can resolve political tensions,” said Cho. “I hope that I can share my experiences with my peers at GPS.”

Arriving to San Diego with his wife and two children, Cho has enjoyed his first time in the U.S., visiting several states this summer with his family while attending the program. Enjoying the California lifestyle, he references being most inspired by his fellow classmates.

“The best part about being at GPS is all the friends I’ve met, many who are very talented and much younger than me,” laughs Cho. “Having those peers is inspiring, funny and rejuvenating. It is an honor to have chances to socialize with the next generation.”

Although Cho is scheduled to return to Korea and resume his work for the NEC after earning his degree from GPS, Cho is grateful for his COP experience. He noted that he has gained additional skills from learning how to prepare for job interviews to resume and cover letter writing and information about navigating career conferences.
“My goal when I return to Korea is to create a more transparent and convenient circumstances for the electorate in my country and around the globe,” said Cho. “So, who knows? I could have a job back here some day!”
